CITING SOURCES (MLA STYLE)

Introduction: Everybody wants to get credit for his or her own ideas and work. Therefore, you should understand how to indicate in a paper the source of ideas or words not your own. You may use information from sources either in the original words or in your own words as in a paraphrase or summary. Credit must be given in two places: within the text of your paper, and on the last page, which will be titled "Works Cited." Failure to do so is called plagiarism. Therefore, take notes carefully and always give credit as explained below.

1. Within The Text - Parenthetical Citations: Author's last name, followed by a space, and then the page number - all enclosed in parentheses before the period. Example: (Angelou 32)
   A. Using Sources in Original Words
      1. Quote the writer's exact words when they are so well stated that a restatement would diminish their impact. Short quotations are enclosed by quotation marks. To introduce the quotation, use a verb like says, observes, points out, or reports, followed by either a colon or a comma.

      As the writer says in "My Name is Margaret," "a white woman's kitchen became my finishing school" (Angelou 32).

      2. Long quotations (more than four lines) are blocked and indented five spaces on either side and single-spaced, with a colon following the sentence introducing the quotation. Do not use quotation marks.

      Many of the international students from Eastern Asia are finding it harder to pay for their tuition as their native currency drops in value. . . . The value of East Asian currency has dropped significantly because of an economic crash (Chan 1).

   3. When you quote a sentence, do not put it in the middle of your own sentence, but at the end. Remember always to explain the relevance of the quotation in your own words.

   B. Using Sources in Your Own Words

      1. Paraphrasing: Carefully use the information from your source but restate it in your own words, about the same length as the original passage. If you use only your own words, you do not use quotation marks. However, if you use any key words or phrases from the passage you are paraphrasing, you must enclose those key words or phrases in quotation marks.

      2. Summarizing: Restate the important ideas, delete details, and condense the original material. Do not copy any of the author's words. Give credit as stated above.

   C. Using Lead-ins

      1. When you use exact words from a source, use a verb to introduce the words, like those mentioned above in A.1, followed by either a colon or a comma.

      2. When you use a paraphrase or a summary of a source in your paper, you can introduce that paraphrase or summary with an expression similar to the following:

         King points out that …
         According to Chan,…
         Phillip Chan agrees that …

      Do not use a comma after "that."

II. At the end of your paper - Works Cited Page.
The last page of your paper should be titled Works Cited. In alphabetical order of the authors' last names, type the references of sources you used. Double space. Type the first line at the margin and indent five spaces for subsequent lines in each source. Punctuate exactly as shown below. Do not number entries. See Chapter 37, pp. 676-724, The Scott, Foresman Handbook for Writers, for detailed information on MLA documentation, or

Sample Entries: Published Materials

Article in a book:

Article in a magazine:

Article in a newspaper:

Electronic Media

CD-Rom: To cite a CD-ROM or similar electronic database, provide basic information about the source itself - author, title, and publication 'Information. Identify the publication medium (CD-ROM; diskette; magnetic tape) and the name of the vendor if available.

<http://op.2site.stsci.eduWpubinfo/PR/97/35/>.

Citation for entire site:

The difference between a bibliography and a list of works cited is that a bibliography is a listing of each book you have consulted whether or not you have referred to it in your paper. A works cited list is a list of only those books you have actually used and given credit to in your paper.